Speech acts spoken by English teachers during a teaching-learning process is important to avoid any misunderstanding between the teachers and the learner. It is since teachers are the most important center in a teaching-learning process.

This research took the Searle theory about speech acts to identify and the most dominant speech acts. Searle's theory has 5 classification; they are declarative, representative, directive, expressive, commissive.

This is a descriptive-qualitative research. This research is also considered as a study case. The objects were the utterances spoken by the English teachers, labeled AH, during the teaching-learning activity.

The obtained data were words, phrases, and utterances spoken by the teacher. The role of the researcher was as the main instrument. The researcher took over the research process started from the research design until the data report. The data were obtained by observing and recording the audio. Then, the data were processed in the form of written transcripts. They were then adjusted with the objectives of the research. They were noted, interpreted, and analyzed in the data sheet by using speech act theory based on Searle's theory. The applied data analysis was qualitative method of Miles and Huberman (1994). The coding system was also applied to facilitate the analysis process. This research compared by applying theoretical comparison from Searle. The researcher checked the utterances by using the voice recording and notes by triangulating the applied resource and theories.

The findings showed four speech act elements applied by the teacher. They were representative, directive, expressive, and commissive. The most dominant-applied speech act was directive act (60%). Meanwhile the speech act that was not applied was declarative utterance (0%). It was deemed declarative speech since the speaker had a specific institutional role. The most frequent applied direction by the teacher in the teaching process occurred in the Q&A question. It was the most dominant act. The directions were used as the controlling meant during in the class. The Q&A question session promoted by the teacher had function to encourage the learners' question about the learned materials.
